the state of nature, we have said, is a state of perfect freedom; and in it, all men are equal, and are entitled to the same rights. In this state, every man has a power of doing what he pleases, provided he does not hurt another; and he is not bound to any law, but only to the law of nature, which is the law of reason. This law of nature teaches us that we ought not to do to others what we would not have them do to us; and that we ought to preserve as much liberty as is compatible with the rights of others. In this state, every man has a right to his own person, and to his own estate; and he has a right to the fruits of his industry and labor. He has also a right to the same measure of liberty and security as every other man has. In this state, there is no authority, no government, no law, but only the law of nature, which is the law of reason. The executive power is to be such as is most proper for the execution of these laws, and for the maintenance of the peace and order of the society. The judicial power is to be such as is most proper for the determination of disputes, and for the punishment of offenders.
