§ 40. The sublime in nature is that which presents itself as a representation of the infinite, and which, though limited by the faculties of our senses, nevertheless affords the mind an occasion for extending its power beyond all bounds of sense. The imagination is unable to give an adequate representation of the magnitude of the object, and the mind is thus forced to transcend the limits of sense, and to represent itself as a power that is not limited by any object of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 41. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 42. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 43. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 44. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 45. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 46. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 47. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 48. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 49. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.

§ 50. The sublime in nature is not a property of the object itself, but a feeling of the mind. It is a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense. The sublime is thus a feeling of the mind's superiority to nature, and of its own power to transcend the limits of sense.
